In one experiment in Dallas, which he cifed to the association, he said that a man under arrest, charged with a serious crime, seemed almost certain of conviction on circumstantial evidence. "Twilight sleep" was induced without the prisoner's knowledge, and he gave information which, when checked up by the Dallas police, proved the man's innocence and resulted in his acquittal.

The physician held that, when his theory has been adequately proved by thorough experiment in hundreds of cases, a new field in criminal investigation will be opened up, which will not only prove a powerful aid in the detection of criminals, but will also become a great protection to those unjustly accused of crime.
